

Seventh Sunday After Pentecost

Dominica Septima Post Pentecosten

TLM propers: confessed truth, holy fruit, one sacrifice, and healing grace

Proper	TLM text / reference	Scriptural axis	Connection
Introit	Omnes gentes, plaudite manibus; Quoniam Dominus excelsus, terribilis: Rex magnus super omnem terram (Ps. 46:2–3)	Hands, voice, and the universal King	All nations acclaim with hands and jubilant voice because the Lord is the great King over all the earth.
Collect	Deus, cuius providentia: remove all harms; grant all things profitable	Providence ordering to the good	The Church asks unfailing providence both to remove what injures and to supply what leads toward the good.
Epistle	Rom. 6:19–23	Members, masters, fruit, and ends	Members once presented to impurity are now presented to justice; sanctification is present fruit and eternal life God's gift.
Gradual	Venite, filii, audite me; Accedite ad eum, et illuminamini (Ps. 33:12, 6)	Hearing, fear, and illumination	Children are summoned to hear the fear of the Lord and to approach him for light without shame.
Alleluia	Omnes gentes, plaudite manibus (Ps. 46:2)	Renewed royal acclamation	The Introit's summons returns immediately before Christ's warning about deceptive religious voices.
Gospel	Matt. 7:15–21	Prophets, trees, fruits, and obedience	Claim and clothing do not suffice: works disclose the tree, and entrance belongs to the doer of the Father's will.
Offertory	Sicut in holocaustis arietum (Dan. 3:40)	Humble sacrifice in the furnace	Azariah asks that an offering made in deprivation be accepted like abundant legal victims.
Secret	Legalium differentiam hostiarum unius sacrificii perfectione sanxisti; singuli / cunctis	Many figures, one sacrifice, common profit	God is asked to sanctify the gifts as Abel's, so that what individuals offered for his honor may profit all unto salvation.
Communion	Inclina aurem tuam, accelera, ut eripias me (Ps. 30:3)	Urgent deliverance	The communicant remains a suppliant who asks God to bend near and hasten to rescue.
Postcommunion	Tua nos, Domine, medicinalis operatio	Medicine, release, and right direction	The sacramental operation is asked to free the recipients from perversities and lead them to what is right.

Sense	Synthesis
Literal	Romans 6 contrasts two services, two fruits, and two ends; Matthew 7 warns against false prophets, tests trees by fruit, and requires the Father's will rather than bare acclamation.
Allegorical	Christ is the universal King, the true teacher, and the obedient Son. The many legal victims reach their perfection in his one sacrifice, through which the Church offers and receives.
Moral	Voice must agree with works; doctrine and life must both be tested; the members must be presented to justice; and every offerer must submit to the same healing sought for others.
Anagogical	The Gospel's fire and kingdom and Paul's death and eternal life disclose final judgment, while medicinal grace is given now to form fruit ordered to life.

Condensed Authoritative Exposition

Governing thesis: confession must become holy fruit

The Introit and Alleluia repeat Psalm 46’s joining of hands and voice. Augustine reads them as works and confession that must agree. Under God’s kingship and providence, the remaining propers test and heal that concord: grace redirects the members, true hearing approaches Christ, fruit exposes doctrine and life, personal gifts enter one sacrifice for all, and communicants remain patients of divine medicine.

Reading order. This four-stage path is the guide’s source-grounded synthesis of the appointed order. The cited Fathers expound particular texts or doctrines; none is presented as the author of the complete Roman formulary.

1. Acclaim and ask: confession stands under the King

The Introit places hands and voice beneath the great King over all the earth; discernment is therefore service, not private sovereignty. The Collect asks unfailing providence to remove harms and grant what profits. St. Thomas teaches that providence is certain without cancelling contingency or free choice (Summa theologiae I, q. 22, a. 4). Divine government orders and assists the moral agency demanded by Paul and Christ; it does not replace it.

The inherited key — St. Augustine, Exposition on Psalm 46, 2–3
For the verse sung at Introit and Alleluia, Augustine says: “Agree together must the hands and tongue. Let this confess, these work.” He grounds their concord in the kingship of the crucified and ascended Christ, who gathers a people from all nations.

2. Hear and discern: fruit tests religious voice

The Gradual first supplies the positive pattern: children hear the fear of the Lord and approach him for light. Augustine reads Christ teaching through ministers and the faithful approaching by faith and charity to receive his Body and Blood. The Alleluia then repeats the command to voice-and-hands before Matthew tests prophetic appearance, teaching, conduct, and obedience.

Question	Appointed test	Decisive witness	Boundary
What is true hearing?	The Gradual joins instruction, approach, illumination, and freedom from shame.	Augustine, Psalm 33 , 9 and 15, joins Christ’s teaching through ministers to faithful and charitable approach.	Hearing is receptive and sacramental; a teacher’s demeanor alone does not establish truth.
What can fruit show?	Matthew 7 makes the tree visible through fruit and places fire and kingdom under God’s judgment.	Chrysostom sees corrupt life masked by virtue, yet insists that the person can change.	Fruit discloses a present moral state, not an immutable nature, hidden intention, or final verdict.
How are doctrine and life tested?	Saying “Lord, Lord” cannot replace doing the Father’s will; prophetic clothing does not suffice.	Augustine and Jerome test deceptive doctrine and conduct; Didache 11 tests both, while Irenaeus III.3 anchors doctrine in apostolic tradition.	Conduct affects credibility but does not create revelation; true words never excuse a corrupt life.

3. Offer and be gathered: grace-grown fruit enters one sacrifice

The Epistle, Offertory, and Secret move from converted members to humble oblation and from individual gifts to ecclesial profit. Their shared subject is not autonomous achievement but human action received, redirected, and sanctified by grace.

Moment	What the proper establishes	Decisive source-grounded control
Fruit — Epistle	Romans transfers the members from impurity to justice, slavery to sin to service of God, shame to sanctification, and death to eternal life. Death is sin's stipendia ; life is God's gratia .	Chrysostom, Romans 12, distinguishes present holiness from the promised end. Augustine, Grace and Free Will 18–21, says that God crowns works which grace itself enables. Fruit is required, but it is not self-originating merit.
Poverty — Offertory	In Daniel 3, Azariah lacks altar, prince, prophet, and animal victim. He offers a contrite soul and asks that it be received like abundant sacrifices.	The Church therefore approaches as an endangered petitioner, not an accomplished observer displaying its fruit. Humility and trust become the moral body's form at the altar.
One for all — Secret	God perfects the diverse legal victims in one sacrifice, receives gifts as Abel's, and orders what singuli offer toward the salvation of cunctis .	Augustine, City of God X.5–6 and 20, identifies Christ as priest and victim and the Church as his self-offering body. Irenaeus IV.18 makes Abel's righteous heart inseparable from acceptable oblation.

4. Receive and be healed: the discernor remains a patient

Communion and Postcommunion — supplication becomes medicine

Communion: “Incline your ear; make haste to deliver me.” Augustine, Psalms 30, 1–4, hears first the humbled Mediator and then his people; the community testing fruit still receives as a petitioner.

Postcommunion: God's medicinal operation must release us from perversity and lead us toward right things. Ignatius, Ephesians 20, and Thomas, Summa theologiae III, q. 79, a. 6, illuminate Eucharistic medicine; they do not directly comment on this prayer. Its efficacy strengthens charity without making conversion or vigilance unnecessary.

Four guardrails — the limits should be visible at a glance

- State is not nature. A bad tree names a present moral condition; repentance and later failure remain possible.
- Fruit is not the final verdict. Manifest teaching and conduct permit prudent judgment, not inspection of the hidden heart or seizure of God's judgment.
- Credibility is not revelation. Conduct affects whether a teacher is trustworthy; apostolic truth is not created by personality, and true words do not excuse vice.
- Grace is not passivity. Holy fruit and sacramental effects are God's gifts, yet the healed will must still consent, act, persevere, and remain watchful.

Agency throughout — three subjects, one ordered action

God governs, gives eternal life, perfects the sacrifice, delivers, and heals. The worshipper confesses, presents the members, hears, tests fruit, offers, and petitions. The Church gathers individual gifts for the good of all and receives medicine without placing herself beyond judgment. Thus divine gift and human action, personal offering and ecclesial communion, remain distinct without being separated.

Expansive Authoritative Exposition

Textual basis and the Sunday's lexical structure

The ten proper texts were located with the public Internet Archive OCR finding aid stored in `propers/retrieved.txt` and visually collated against the scanned 1962 Vatican typical edition, printed pages 386–387. The reviewed transcription and complete provenance are stored in `propers/verified.md`. The scan confirms the rank (II classis), the Creed, the Preface of the Most Holy Trinity, every biblical reference, the Introit psalm verse, and the forms legalium differentiam hostiarum, singuli, cunctis, and medicinalis operatio. Psalm numbers throughout are Vulgate/Septuagint numbers; most modern English Bibles label Psalms 46, 33, and 30 as Psalms 47, 34, and 31.

Four lexical structures carry much of the formulary's sourced unity:

Words	Immediate contrast	Theological work	Limit
voce / manibus	Voice and hands acclaim the King in Psalm 46.	Augustine directly interprets them as confession and good works in concord.	He comments on the psalm, not on this later Mass formulary.
exhibuistis / exhibete	The same members once presented to impurity are now to be presented to justice.	Conversion redirects embodied agency; freedom from one master becomes service to God.	Paul's slavery analogy is explicitly "human" language adapted to the hearers' weakness.
fructum / fructus	Romans names sanctification as fruit; Matthew names deeds as the fruit by which a tree is known.	The repeated noun makes holy conduct both a grace-produced reality and publicly relevant evidence.	A visible act does not disclose every intention or by itself prove doctrine true.
singuli / cunctis	Individuals offer; the Secret asks profit for all.	Personal oblation is ordered to ecclesial salvation within the one sacrifice.	The prayer does not dissolve persons into a collective or make every private intention universally efficacious by itself.

Psalm 46: a checked concordance of hands and voice

Psalm 46 is an enthronement psalm: the nations are summoned to acclaim because God is the great King over all the earth. The Mass appoints its first command at both Introit and Alleluia and adds the reason at the entrance, Quoniam Dominus excelsus, terribilis: Rex magnus super omnem terram. The repeated acclamation is therefore framed by sovereignty, not by applause as self-expression.

Augustine's Exposition on Psalm 46, 2–3, supplies an unusually exact inherited bridge. He asks why the nations clap with hands and answers: because of good works. Mouth without active hands is defective; hands without confessing tongue are also defective. The two must agree. He then interprets the King over all the earth christologically: the one mocked and crucified has purchased the world by his blood and ascended as universal King.

Liturgical occurrence	What the text establishes	What Augustine adds
Introit	The whole assembly enters by a command addressed to all nations; hands and jubilant voice act together under the great King.	The bodily action signifies good works and the voice confession; Christ's blood grounds the worldwide people.
Alleluia	The same command is repeated immediately before Matthew's warning about false prophetic appearance and speech.	The inherited demand for agreement supplies a positive standard for the Gospel's negative warning.

Liturgical occurrence	What the text establishes	What Augustine adds
Gospel response	Matthew contrasts saying “Lord, Lord” with doing the Father’s will.	Augustine’s psalm exposition and his Matthew exposition independently insist that a merely vocal confession is incomplete.

The final row is a source-grounded synthesis, not a claim of patristic commentary on the lectionary pairing. It is warranted because the appointed texts themselves contrast voice and deed, while Augustine directly expounds both texts in that direction. No claim is made that he knew or intended this Sunday’s later Roman arrangement.

Matthew 7: appearance, fruit, doctrine, and judgment

The immediate context is essential. Jesus has just contrasted the narrow way ending in life with the broad way ending in destruction (Matt. 7:13–14). After the appointed verses he warns that prophecy, exorcism, and wonders done in his name do not replace righteousness (7:22–23), and he closes the sermon with two hearers: one hears and does, building on rock; the other hears and does not, building a ruin (7:24–27). The liturgical pericope stops at verse 21, but the complete paragraph shows why “fruit” cannot mean charisma, visibility, or religious vocabulary alone.

Direct witness	Who is foregrounded?	What counts as fruit?	Guardrail
St. John Chrysostom, Homilies 23–24 on Matthew	In Homily 23 he chiefly distinguishes persons of corrupt life who mask themselves with virtue from open enemies; he does not primarily identify them with heretics.	The difficult, sustained practice of virtue exposes the show; in Homily 24, doing the Father’s will outranks bare confession and even charismatic gifts.	An evil person may become good, but cannot bear good fruit while persisting in evil. Christ commands watchfulness, not private punishment.
St. Augustine, On the Sermon on the Mount II.24–25	He includes heretics and all deceptive seekers of worldly advantage under Christian appearance.	Manifest works of the flesh and fruit of the Spirit matter; trials involving hoped-for gain or feared loss disclose governing love.	Ascetic acts can be costume; hearts remain hidden. A bad teacher’s true doctrine is the vine’s grape gathered through thorns.
St. Jerome, Commentary on Matthew I at 7:15–22	He emphasizes heretics whose fasting, chastity, and restraint conceal poisonous teaching, then turns to orthodox speakers whose lives destroy their teaching.	Doctrine and conduct reciprocally confirm or contradict a claimant.	Moses, Jethro, Judas, and Paul show that “tree” is not an immutable human nature; repentance and fall remain possible.

The differences are real. Chrysostom says that he thinks corrupt hypocrites rather than heretics are foremost; Augustine explicitly includes false claimants to Christian wisdom; Jerome gives heresy special emphasis and then equally insists on moral integrity. The three agree on conversion and on the insufficiency of appearance, but the guide does not flatten their objects into a fabricated consensus.

Three judgments that must not be collapsed

Moral fruit: persistent, manifest action bears on credibility and may require avoidance. Doctrinal norm: teaching is measured by apostolic revelation, not generated by the teacher’s attractiveness or vice. Final judgment: the fire and the kingdom belong to God; limited human judgment of public words and deeds is not omniscience about the heart. The Didache 11 already keeps teaching and conduct as distinct tests, while Irenaeus III.3 identifies the public apostolic succession and preaching as the doctrinal rule.

Romans 6: freedom becomes a gifted service

Romans 6:19–23 concludes an argument begun with baptism into Christ’s death (6:1–11) and continued through the command not to let sin reign in the mortal body (6:12–18). Paul’s slavery comparison is deliberately accommodated to “the infirmity of your flesh.” It is not an endorsement of human slavery or a complete definition of Christian freedom. Its purpose is to deny a supposed neutral zone in which the members serve no governing love.

Pauline hinge	Chrysostom’s direct exegesis	Augustinian doctrinal precision
Exhibuistis / exhibete	Paul asks at least the same earnestness toward the immeasurably better master; the members are truly presented in embodied service.	Grace does not make exhortation fictitious: the healed will truly acts, although its new power and love are gifts.
Liberati a peccato, servi autem facti Deo	Liberation, service to righteousness, and holiness are already possessed fruits rather than only distant promises.	Freedom is not independence from God; the works rewarded are God’s workmanship enacted by the believer.
Fructum ... in sanctificationem, finem vero vitam aeternam	Present sanctification gives evidence for the future end held in hope; shame and death mark the opposite service.	Eternal life is reward and grace because the good life crowned is itself grace (On Grace and Free Will 18–21).
Stipendia ... mors; gratia ... vita aeterna	Paul refuses parallel terms: death is sin’s pay, but life is not described as wages earned from God.	Augustine makes the asymmetry decisive against both boasting and the denial that good works matter.

The same Latin noun, fructus, links the Epistle to the Gospel without making the two passages identical. In Matthew, fruit is evidence by which a teacher is known; in Romans, sanctification is the fruit of transferred allegiance and divine liberation. The juxtaposition yields a controlled conclusion: the fruit Christ requires is not a self-created credential, and the gift Paul proclaims is not fruitless permission.

Collect and Gradual: governed, taught, and enlightened

No direct patristic commentary on this Collect was located in the surveyed Latin and English corpora. Its own syntax is nonetheless clear. God’s providentia does not fail in sui dispositione; the suppliants ask a twofold action, noxia cuncta submoveas and omnia nobis profutura concedas. Discernment thus begins with dependence: the Church asks God both to clear what harms and to give what truly profits.

Thomas Aquinas’s Summa theologiae I, q. 22, a. 4 is doctrinal illumination, not commentary on the Collect. He distinguishes the unfailing order of providence from a necessity that would destroy contingency. Providence includes things happening through free causes precisely as free. This distinction prevents two errors: the prayer is not anxiety that God may lose control, and confidence in providence is not permission to ignore Paul’s imperative or Christ’s test.

The Gradual answers the question of whose teaching heals perception. Psalm 33:12 calls children to hear the fear of the Lord; verse 6 calls them to approach and be enlightened. Augustine’s direct exposition is multilevel but exact. At section 15 he hears Christ as the teacher speaking through ministers. At section 9 he says the nations approach Christ by faith, longing, and the twofold charity of God and neighbor; he explicitly associates the approach with reception of the Crucified’s Body and Blood. At section 17, the verses following the Gradual’s first line move immediately from hearing to doing: keep the tongue from evil, depart from evil, and do good. True teaching is therefore neither disembodied information nor private suspicion; it draws the hearer toward Christ, charity, sacrament, and action.

Offertory and Secret: deprivation, perfection, and common profit

The Offertory is incompletely understood if Daniel 3:40 is isolated from Azariah’s furnace prayer. In verses 38–39 there is no prince, prophet, leader, holocaust, sacrifice, oblation, incense, or place to offer first-fruits. The petitioner does not pretend those losses are irrelevant. Instead he asks that contrite soul and humble spirit be received, and then compares the desired acceptance to rams, bulls, and thousands of fat lambs. Verse 41 continues with wholehearted following; verse 42 grounds the plea in God’s mercy. Material deprivation becomes neither contempt for liturgy nor confidence in interior sincerity by itself.

Chrysostom’s Homily 20 on Romans is not direct exegesis of this Offertory. While explaining the living sacrifice of Romans 12, however, he cites the furnace prayer and then treats eyes, tongue, hands, feet, and hearing as members presented to God rather than retained for selfish use. Because Romans 6 has already commanded the presentation of the members, his checked comparison supplies doctrinal illumination for bodily self-offering without pretending that he commented on this Sunday’s sequence. No secure direct patristic commentary on Daniel 3:40 itself was located.

No direct patristic commentary on the Secret was located. Its grammar itself provides a compact theology:

Clause	Grammatical force	Doctrinal illumination	Boundary
legalium differentiam hostiarum	The legal victims are genuinely diverse.	Augustine, City of God X.20, calls ancient sacrifices various signs of the one true sacrifice.	Diversity of figures does not mean several saving sacrifices parallel to Christ.
unius sacrificii perfectione sanxisti	God’s completed act is confessed before the petitions: one sacrifice gives perfection and definitive order.	Christ is priest and victim; the Church offers herself through him.	The Mass does not repeat Calvary as another sacrifice but sacramentally belongs to the one sacrifice.
sicut munera Abel, sanctifica	God is asked to sanctify the present gifts as Abel’s gifts were accepted.	Irenaeus IV.18 joins Abel’s acceptance to righteousness, single-mindedness, and communion with the neighbor.	Moral disposition does not cause the objective sacrifice, but hypocrisy cannot profit by outward correctness.
quod singuli obtulerunt ... cunctis proficiat	A singular relative clause gathers what individuals offered and asks that it profit everyone unto salvation.	Augustine’s redeemed city is offered as one sacrifice through the High Priest (X.6).	The text grounds a personal-to-common movement, not a theory that every private intention has identical effects.

Communion and Postcommunion: the delivered still need cure

Psalm 30 moves from trust through urgent rescue to committal of the spirit. Augustine’s Exposition on Psalm 30, 1–4, first assigns the voice to the humbled Mediator and then to the people redeemed by his blood. He interprets “bend down your ear” as hearing Christ in humiliation and “make haste to deliver me” within the completion of his body and the final separation from sinners. Whatever one makes of each prosopological detail, the direct exposition blocks a complacent reading: Communion places the Church within Christ’s petitioning voice.

No direct patristic commentary on Tua nos, Domine, medicinalis operatio was found in the surveyed corpora. The prayer’s verbs, however, state both release and direction. The operation is God’s; its recipients are nos; it loosens them a nostris perversitatibus and leads them ad ea quae sunt recta. Medicine does not merely cancel an external penalty. It addresses perverse turnings and conducts the will toward right objects and acts.

St. Ignatius and St. Thomas — doctrinal illumination

Ignatius, Ephesians 20, calls the one bread broken in ecclesial unity the “medicine of immortality” and antidote against death. Thomas, Summa theologiae III, q. 79, a. 6, says the Eucharist strengthens spiritual life as food and medicine and guards against sin through union with Christ and the Passion; his reply to the first objection retains the continuing mutability of free will. Together they illuminate the Postcommunion’s medicine without claiming to explain its historical composition.

An especially close liturgical parallel appears in De sacramentis IV.6.27–28, transmitted under St. Ambrose’s name but of disputed authorship. Its Eucharistic prayer recalls the gifts of righteous Abel; the following catechesis says that, because the Christian repeatedly sins, he repeatedly needs medicine. This is not the exact Secret or Postcommunion, but it is checked Ambrosian liturgical illumination joining Abel, Eucharistic reception, remission, and medicine.

The Collect and Postcommunion share a demonstrable direction. The first asks removal of noxia and the gift of profutura; the last asks release from perversitates and guidance to recta. The opening petition is answered not by making judgment unnecessary but by asking that sacramental grace heal the judge and doer. The Gospel’s tree can change, as Chrysostom, Augustine, and Jerome all insist; the formulary ends by asking God to effect that change in those who have heard it.

Authority calibration

The missal text, full biblical contexts, and repeated Latin vocabulary are textual observations. Augustine on Psalms 46, 33, and 30; Augustine, Chrysostom, and Jerome on Matthew 7; and Chrysostom on Romans 6 are direct exegesis of appointed passages, though not of this Roman formulary. The Didache and Irenaeus on apostolic teaching, Thomas on providence and Eucharistic effect, Chrysostom on Romans 12 and Daniel, Irenaeus on Abel, Augustine on sacrifice and grace, and Ignatius on Eucharistic medicine are doctrinal or closely related illumination. The condensed section's principal relations are restricted to repeated appointed wording and these checked interpretations. Claims about a possible compositional or devotional itinerary beyond that evidence are reserved below.

Speculative Exposition

The following proposals are editorial syntheses generated for this guide. They may assist prayerful attention, but no cited Father is claimed to have read the Seventh Sunday's formulary as a single composition, and no historical claim about the formulary's compiler follows from them.

A proposed pastoral reversal

This guide proposes that the Sunday's deepest pastoral reversal may be from diagnostic distance to therapeutic participation. The Gospel initially seems to place the hearer before suspect teachers as an examiner. The Offertory, Secret, Communion, and Postcommunion may then turn the same hearer inward and ecclesially outward: one's sacrifice must be accepted, one's gift is for all, one's need for deliverance persists, and one's own perversity needs cure. The proposal is consistent with the texts and doctrines already established, but the precise reversal is not explicitly taught by a source and therefore remains speculative.

A proposed convergence

Five recurring pairs may also be heard as progressively reunited rather than merely balanced. Voice becomes embodied in work; true doctrine seeks a truthful life; freedom takes the form of service to God; individual offering enters the Church's common sacrifice; and the warning of judgment is met by present medicine. This pattern may suggest that discernment reaches maturity not when it becomes maximally suspicious, but when truthful confession, apostolic doctrine, holy action, ecclesial charity, and sacramental dependence converge. That convergence is a proposed listening aid, not an additional rule for deciding disputed doctrinal or personal cases.

Notable Quotables

Irony — The Night of the Hunter (Charles Laughton, 1955), opening prologue, approximately 2:27–3:16

Rachel Cooper (Lillian Gish) addresses children against a starry sky and recites Matthew 7:15–20, including “Beware of false prophets” and “by their fruits ye shall know them.” The film cuts first to children discovering a murdered woman and then, as Cooper repeats the text, to Harry Powell discussing another killing while dressed and speaking as a preacher. This is an exact quotation in King James wording and an ironic framing device: the audience receives the interpretive verdict before most characters recognize the wolf. The American Film Institute's catalog synopsis independently verifies the quotation and the two cuts.

References

Primary sources

- Missale Romanum, editio typica (Vatican City: Typis Polyglottis Vaticanis, 1962), Dominica Septima post Pentecosten, pp. 386–387, facsimile; publication text visually collated against the page images.
- Internet Archive, Missale Romanum (1962) item and full-text OCR; used only to locate and preserve the focused raw retrieval. Accessed 2026-07-10; checksums and discrepancies are recorded in `propers/verified.md`.
- Holy Scripture: Psalm 46 in full; Psalm 33 in full; Psalm 30:1–6; Daniel 3:38–43; Genesis 4:1–10; Matthew 7:13–27; Romans 6 in full; Romans 12:1–2; Hebrews 9:23–10:18. Psalm numbering follows the Vulgate and missal.
- Didache 2, 9–11, 14, especially 11, ANF text; St. Ignatius, Ephesians 20, ANF text.
- St. Ambrose (or the Ambrosian author), De sacramentis IV.6.27–28, public-domain Latin text; Abel, Eucharistic remission, and medicine.
- St. Irenaeus, Against Heresies III.3.1–4, apostolic preaching; IV.18.1–6, Abel and oblation.
- St. John Chrysostom, Homilies 23–24 on Matthew, on 7:15–27, 23 and 24; Homily 12 on Romans, on 6:19–23, text; Homily 20 on Romans, on 12:1–2 and Daniel, text.
- St. Jerome, Commentary on Matthew, book I, comments on Matthew 7:15–22, Latin text with facing French notes, pp. 80–83; checked paraphrase from the Latin.
- St. Augustine, Expositions: Psalm 46, 2–3, text; Psalm 33, 9, 15, 17, text; Psalm 30, 1–4, text. English headings use Psalms 47, 34, and 31.
- St. Augustine, Sermon on the Mount II.24.78–81, II.25.82–87, text; City of God X.5–6, 20, text; Grace and Free Will 18–21, text.
- St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae I, q. 22, a. 4, text; III, q. 79, a. 6, text; English Dominican Province trans., 1920.
- The Night of the Hunter, dir. Charles Laughton, screenplay credited to James Agee (United Artists, 1955), opening prologue.

Edition and cultural-verification source

- American Film Institute, The Night of the Hunter, history/synopsis of the opening; accessed 2026-07-10.

Search Scope and Limitations

The formulary search covered the public Internet Archive OCR and color-scan item and the CMAA-hosted 1962 Vatican typical-edition facsimile; publication forms were visually collated against the latter and preserved with provenance in the Sunday directory. Biblical study covered the appointed psalms, Romans 6, Matthew 7:13–27, Daniel 3:38–43, Genesis 4, Romans 12, and Hebrews 9–10 in Latin and English. The patristic survey covered accessible ANF/NPNF collections, CCEL, Jerome and the Ambrosian De sacramentis in Latin, the Catena Aurea as a lead index, and targeted Latin and English searches. Direct commentary was found for the psalms, Matthew 7, and Romans 6, but not for the Collect, Secret, Postcommunion, or exact Daniel 3:40; other witnesses are labeled doctrinal or immediate-context illumination.

This broad feasible online survey does not exhaust manuscripts, untranslated works, subscription databases, or modern critical scholarship; older public-domain translations are working texts. Cultural searches tested exact and variant wording from Matthew 7, Romans 6, and the appointed psalms across digitized literature, film transcripts and clips, music leads, and web indexes. Only The Night of the Hunter met the verification and significance threshold; coincidental phrases and quotation aggregates were discarded.

Generation Metadata

Generation date: 2026-07-10

AI model: gpt-5.6-sol

AI model qualifiers: Reasoning effort ultra; effective designation gpt-5.6-sol ultra for the primary agent and subagents

AI agent: OpenAI Codex primary drafting/revision agent; Codex research and review subagents

AI agent version: Codex CLI 0.144.1 (installed client); server-side agent revisions not exposed by the AI environment

AI environment: OpenAI Codex workspace accessed via API