Prayer after Communion	Sumpsimus, Domine, divinum sacramentum; perpetual memorial of the Son's Passion, the gift of love advancing salvation

Sense	Synthesis
Literal	Solomon asks for a discerning heart; the Psalm treasures God's instruction; Paul names divine purpose and conformity to the Son; Jesus compares the Kingdom to treasure, pearl, net, and a trained householder, with the final two images only in the long branch.
Allegorical	Christ is the Son to whose image the called are conformed and the revealer in whom the Kingdom is received; the Church is gathered, offered, nourished, and saved by grace, and in the long branch is instructed from Scripture's new and old treasures.
Moral	Ask for wisdom rather than advantage; value God's word beyond gain; choose the Kingdom joyfully; refuse fatalism and prosperity slogans; under the Communion alternatives, remember benefits or practice mercy and purity of heart.
Anagogical	Eternal goods, the final sorting of the long-form net, conformity to the firstborn Son, Communion B's promised vision, and salvation at work direct temporal choices toward communion with God.

Scriptural Date and Location

Canonical order governs. Each dossier first locates the text's formation and then, where distinct, its narrated event; inherited attribution and modern historical judgment are kept visible together.

Textual unit / alternative	Citation	Location	Date
First Reading	1 Kgs. 3:5, 7–12	Israel and Judah; final compilation place unknown	Final literary form commonly exilic
Narrated event	1 Kgs. 3:4–15	Gibeon, at the principal high place	Early reign of Solomon, conventionally c. 970 BC

Kings belongs to the Deuteronomistic History and addresses the divided kingdoms through disputed editorial stages; the final form is commonly placed in the exile. That literary horizon is distinct from the dream scene in which a young king confesses inadequacy before the people entrusted to him (First Kings introduction and 3, NABRE).

Entrance adaptation	Cf. Ps. 67:6–7, 36 (modern 68)	Israelite liturgical tradition; exact place and first audience unknown	Davidic superscription inherited; historical date unknown

This complex processional hymn praises God as warrior, defender of the vulnerable, giver of a household, and source of strength. Its superscription belongs to the received text but does not securely date its composition; the Entrance adapts selected clauses rather than relocating the entire Psalm (Psalms introduction and Psalm 68, NABRE).

Communion A	Ps. 102:2 (modern 103)	Israel; exact composition place and first audience unknown	Davidic superscription inherited; historical date unknown
--------------------	------------------------	--	---

The inherited superscription is not a recoverable event notice. The whole hymn summons the self to bless and remember, then unfolds divine mercy, healing, rescue, compassion, and creaturely frailty (Psalms introduction and Psalm 103, NABRE).

Responsorial Psalm	Ps. 119:57, 72, 76–77, 97a, 127–130	Israel's Torah and wisdom tradition; exact place unknown	Anonymous; date unknown
---------------------------	-------------------------------------	--	-------------------------

The alphabetic meditation supplies no author, narrated event, or site. These separated stanzas name the Lord as portion, value instruction beyond wealth, ask covenant mercy, love the commands, and welcome the understanding their unfolding gives (Psalm 119, NABRE).

Communion B	Matt. 5:7–8	Greek Matthew; probably Syria, with Antioch plausible	Commonly c. AD 80–90
Narrated event	Matt. 5:1–12	Galilee; mountain site unrecorded	Public ministry, conventionally c. AD 28

Ancient tradition attributes the Gospel to the apostle Matthew; modern study commonly identifies an otherwise unknown Jewish Christian author writing for a mixed Jewish and Gentile community after AD 70. The final Greek Gospel's setting is distinct from the Galilean sermon it narrates (Matthew introduction and 5, NABRE).

Acclamation source	Cf. Matt. 11:25	Greek Matthew; probably Syria, with Antioch plausible	Commonly c. AD 80–90
Narrated event	Matt. 11:20–30	Galilee; exact place unrecorded	Public ministry, conventionally c. AD 28–29

The adaptation draws from Jesus' thanksgiving after judgment sayings concerning Galilean towns. The Gospel's traditional attribution and modern compositional judgment remain as above, while the narrated setting belongs to Jesus' ministry rather than the evangelist's later audience (Matthew introduction and 11, NABRE).

Gospel: long / short	Matt. 13:44–52 / 13:44–46	Greek Matthew; probably Syria, with Antioch plausible	Commonly c. AD 80–90
Narrated event	Matt. 13:36, 44–52	A house in the Sea-of-Galilee teaching region; town unrecorded	Galilean ministry, conventionally c. AD 28

The short branch proclaims treasure and pearl only. The long branch also proclaims the net, final sorting, the disciples' response, and the trained householder's new and old treasures. The Gospel's compositional audience must not be confused with the house and ministry region inside the narrative (Matthew introduction and 13, NABRE).

Second Reading	Rom. 8:28–30	Corinth in Achaia, to established house churches at Rome	c. AD 56–58
-----------------------	--------------	--	-------------

Paul writes near the end of his eastern mission to a Roman community he did not found, comprising believers from Jewish and Gentile backgrounds. These verses stand within groaning, Spirit-aided prayer, suffering, and inseparable divine love; the semi-continuous reading is not an explanation of Matthew's treasure or net (Romans introduction and 8, NABRE).

The Propers: Themes and Movement

Governing account

This formulary does not reduce to one slogan. Its correlated strand joins Solomon's listening heart, the Psalm's valuation of divine instruction, and Jesus' treasure and pearl: wisdom learns what is worth choosing. Romans contributes a semi-continuous word about God's purpose amid suffering, not a hidden key to the parables. The proper chants and prayers gather the assembly, order passing goods, return received bounty, and ask that sacramental memory become saving love.

Four-stage movement at a glance

- 1. Hear — Entrance; Collect; First Reading. God gathers and strengthens a people; Solomon confesses inadequacy and asks for judgment that listens.
- 2. Revalue — Psalm; Gospel. Instruction exceeds gold; treasure and pearl expose the Kingdom's incomparable worth and awaken joyful, decisive response.
- 3. Conform — Romans; Acclamation. God's initiative meets a groaning people and directs them toward the Son; revelation remains gift rather than self-mastery.
- 4. Return — Offerings; Communion; final prayer. Goods first received return to God; memory of divine benefits and of the Passion seeks fruit in mercy, purity, and salvation.

Reading order. Stages 1, 2, and 4 correlate appointed texts with ritual sequence; stage 3 keeps Romans semi-continuous. Gospel and Communion alternatives are documented, not combined.

1. Gathered strength becomes a listening heart (Entrance; Collect; First Reading)

The Entrance does not begin with an isolated chooser. Its adapted Psalm first pictures God defending the vulnerable, making a dwelling for the forsaken, and giving strength to a people. The Collect then identifies the source of any strength or holiness and asks God to protect, govern, and guide. Choice is therefore ecclesial and dependent before it is heroic: the assembly is gathered into a household and taught to receive direction.

Solomon gives this dependence political and moral weight. He asks for a heart capable of hearing so that judgment can distinguish good from evil for an entrusted people. Benedict XVI's Angelus for this same Sunday (2011) reads that heart as a conscience attentive to truth and therefore answerable to justice and peace, especially in government. Ambrose earlier links hearing to just judgment. Neither witness makes office self-authenticating: the king's later failures keep received wisdom under the continuing need for fidelity, counsel, and correction.

The Collect's biblical grammar. Ferraro's study in Notitiae traces its titles of protector, ruler, and guide through the Psalms, John 15, and the Exodus tradition. He reads the prayer's passing and enduring goods in an eschatological horizon without cancelling human work or creation's value. As a signed study in the Dicastery's journal, it supplies researched illumination rather than a magisterial decree. The Collect orders created goods through communion with Christ; it does not declare them unreal or unholy.

2. Instruction schools desire for the Kingdom (Responsorial Psalm; Gospel branches)

The Responsorial Psalm makes the prayer for wisdom habitual. The Lord is portion; instruction is valued above silver and gold; mercy is requested; commands are loved; the unfolding word gives understanding. Ambrose's Exposition of Psalm 118 lingers over both comparisons: the Lord as portion displaces rival mastery, and the law above gold describes a willingness to prefer God's word to gain. His Christian preaching receives an Israelite Torah psalm; it does not turn Torah into a failed foil for grace.

Treasure and pearl convert valuation into action. The first figure unexpectedly finds; the merchant deliberately searches. Both recognize a worth that reorganizes every other possession, while only the treasure scene explicitly names joy. Francis's Angelus for this Sunday (2014) preserves that difference between sudden discovery and long search and describes encounter with Christ as giving new meaning even to toil and suffering. Chrysostom likewise stresses gain rather than reluctant loss. They reorder created goods without pricing grace or condemning creation.

3. Providence gives suffering a filial form (Second Reading; Acclamation)

Romans enters from the Sunday cycle rather than from a demonstrated compositional pairing with Matthew. Its immediate context is creation’s groaning, believers’ weakness, and the Spirit’s aid in prayer; its continuation names affliction, persecution, hunger, peril, and death. The promised good is therefore neither uninterrupted comfort nor an assurance that faithful people will prosper. Paul defines the movement by conformity to the Son, the firstborn within a communion of siblings.

Chrysostom reads adversity as material God can turn toward good without calling adversity good in itself. Aquinas similarly distinguishes an evil suffered from the virtues and final good that providence can draw through it. The Council’s Gaudium et spes 22 places Christian suffering within conformity to the incarnate and risen Christ, where life and death receive paschal meaning. The Catechism (nn. 311–312) supplies the necessary moral boundary: God is not the cause of moral evil, and the good drawn from evil never converts evil into good.

What the reading can and cannot promise

The reading gives hope that divine love can work within suffering toward communion with Christ. It does not tell a harmed person that abuse or injustice was secretly good, require passivity, or displace safety, lament, medicine, reporting, restitution, or justice. The acclamation adds teachable humility from Matthew 11; it is a distinct adaptation, not Paul’s definition of predestination.

4. Received gifts return as memory, mercy, and memorial (Prayer over Offerings; Communion A/B; Prayer after Communion)

The Prayer over the Offerings completes the parables’ value movement without turning sacrifice into purchase. The gifts presented already come from divine bounty; the petition asks that the mysteries sanctify present conduct. What is possessed is received, offered, and transformed. This prayer is the common Week XVII formulary, so its resonance with Year A is a liturgical conjunction, not proof that it was composed for these readings.

Communion A commands the soul to bless and remember divine benefits. Communion B instead joins mercy and purity of heart, keeping their distinct promises of mercy and vision. The final prayer gathers either path into the perpetual memorial of the Son’s Passion and asks that the gift of love advance salvation. Memory is therefore active gratitude, and reception seeks moral and ecclesial fruit; neither alternative may be silently blended with the other or treated as mechanically effective apart from grace-enabled response.

Dimension	Appointed anchors	Source-grounded synthesis	Limit
Discernment	Entrance; Collect; 1 Kgs. 3	Gathered strength becomes a hearing heart ordered toward justice.	Office and intelligence do not guarantee fidelity.
Value and joy	Ps. 119; Matt. 13	Instruction, treasure, and pearl disclose a good exceeding gold.	Grace is not bought; creation is not despised.
Filial purpose	Rom. 8; acclamation	Providence works amid groaning toward conformity to the Son.	Evil remains evil; no fatalism or prosperity promise.
Sacramental fruit	Offerings; Communion A/B; final prayer	Received bounty returns as offering, gratitude or mercy, and memorial.	Branches stay distinct; fruit is not mechanical.

New and old without supersession

Only the long Gospel names a trained scribe bringing out treasures new and old. Origen, Augustine, and Aquinas receive the image in relation to the two Testaments and the work of teaching. Yet Matthew calls both stores treasure. The image cannot justify presenting Israel, Jewish Scripture, or Judaism as discarded, barren, or merely obsolete; Christian reading remains indebted to Israel’s Scriptures and must reject contempt for the Jewish people.

The Propers: Detailed Commentary

Solomon asks to hear before he judges (First Reading; Collect)

The lectionary preserves Solomon’s confession of youth and inexperience, the people entrusted to him, the request for a discerning heart, and God’s approval. The omitted material is not silently supplied as proclaimed text. The request is public in consequence even though received in a dream: wisdom is sought for just governance, not private distinction.

Ambrose cites the requested prudent heart in On the Duties of the Clergy II.8, 44–49 as a heart able to hear and judge justly, then develops the later judgment between two mothers. He illuminates the union of prudence and justice; the appointed pericope itself, not Ambrose, supplies the contrast with riches and longevity.

Benedict XVI’s Angelus on this exact Sunday in 2011 moves from Solomon’s hearing heart to conscience: listening to truth enables the distinction of good and evil and places governing responsibility under justice and peace. This is a documented modern liturgical reception, not an alternate translation of 1 Kings. It sharpens the reading’s public consequence without reducing biblical heart-language to one later technical term.

The broader canonical story supplies the indispensable limit. The king who asks well can later accumulate wealth, wives, and divided allegiance. Wisdom received is not fidelity guaranteed. The Collect’s repeated dependence—God as protector, ruler, and guide—keeps discernment from becoming self-certifying expertise.

Giuseppe Ferraro’s biblical commentary on this Collect in Notitiae traces protector to Vulgate Psalm 17, dependence to the vine discourse of John 15, ruler and guide to biblical governance and Exodus, and the passing/enduring contrast to 1 Corinthians 7. Ferraro explicitly refuses the inference that detachment cancels work within the world: created undertakings receive durable value in communion with Christ. The article is a signed study in the Dicastery’s journal, not a magisterial ruling or proof of the prayer’s original compositional sources.

Peter Comestor’s medieval Historia scholastica retells the dream while preserving the distinction between Solomon’s request and God’s additional gifts. It witnesses to the episode’s long pedagogical life but is not an independent source for the ancient event. Later historical and devotional commentators likewise admire the request while the canonical sequel controls idealization.

Movement	Claim	Limit
Confess inadequacy	Office does not create the wisdom it requires.	Humility does not excuse refusal to learn or decide.
Ask for a hearing heart	Discernment serves justice for a concrete people.	It is not intuition exempt from evidence, counsel, or law.
Receive gift	God approves a request ordered beyond advantage.	Gift does not make later choices infallible.

Gathered strength and gifts returned (Entrance; Prayer over Offerings)

The Entrance adapts clauses from Psalm 67 rather than proclaiming a continuous span. The whole processional hymn praises God’s coming, defense of the vulnerable, gift of a household, and strength for the people. Augustine treats divine presence, gathering, and strength as gifts rather than human possession (Exposition on Psalm 68, 6, 8, 40); Bellarmine later receives the same movement within ecclesial praise. Their Christian applications do not erase Israel’s psalm, and anti-Jewish developments elsewhere in the inherited reception are excluded.

The Prayer over the Offerings asks God to receive gifts that first come from divine bounty and to make the mysteries sanctify present conduct. The ritual movement is reception, return, and transformation: the assembly does not purchase grace with its own property. This shared Week XVII prayer may illuminate the Gospel’s relinquishment, but it was not proved to have been composed for Year A or Lectionary 109. There is no Missal Offertory antiphon, and the actual music used remains unknown.

Instruction, treasure, and pearl (Responsorial Psalm; Gospel branches)

Psalm 119 repeatedly turns value into prayer: the Lord is the singer's portion; instruction exceeds gold and silver; commands are loved above fine gold; their unfolding gives light. The refrain's love of the law is not abstract admiration but a sustained appetite formed by meditation, mercy, and obedience.

Ambrose's Exposition of Psalm 118 VIII, 2–4 asks how rare it is to say that the Lord is one's portion without reserving mastery to wealth or appetite. In IX, 21–22 he treats the law above gold and silver as preference proved in action and relates the words of God's mouth to words of eternal life. Augustine keeps the appointed loci's portion, love of law, covenant mercy, wonder, and understanding together; Bellarmine likewise connects valuation and the request for light. None composed the later selection, whose separated stanzas answer to verse 97a.

The two parables intensify valuation. One person encounters treasure and acts in joy; the merchant searches and recognizes one pearl of great price. Chrysostom's Homily 47 on Matthew emphasizes the Kingdom's hidden worth and the single-minded response it evokes. The differences remain: discovery and search, field and market, treasure and pearl should not be flattened into one psychology.

Francis's Angelus for this exact Sunday in 2014 also preserves the difference between unexpected discovery and sustained search, then reads encounter with Christ as reorienting an entire life and giving meaning even to toil, suffering, and death. His 2020 Angelus holds grace and human willingness together: the Kingdom is not achieved by price, yet grace calls for an active welcome. These homilies witness to contemporary liturgical reception; they do not settle Matthew's first-century compositional history.

Joy does not purchase the Kingdom. In both images the incomparable discovery reorganizes possession; the price imagery cannot make salvation a commodity. Nor can "selling all" be abstracted into irresponsible disposal of dependents' goods or contempt for material creation. The Psalm itself values instruction through a material comparison without calling gold evil. Christian reception illuminates only while the Psalm remains Israel's Torah meditation, not obsolete material awaiting Christian ownership.

The long branch: net, judgment, and a scribe with both treasures (long Gospel)

Only the long form proceeds to the net gathering every kind, the shore-side sorting, the angels' final separation, and the householder's new and old treasure. The net gives eschatological seriousness to value: present gathering does not erase final judgment. It is not a mandate for disciples to conduct the angelic sorting now.

Origen's Commentary on Matthew X treats the trained scribe and the relation of new and old learning. Augustine's Sermon 24 likewise insists that the instructed teacher brings both forth rather than discarding one.

Aquinas's own Super Matthaem XIII, lect. 4 arranges the closing parables as dimensions of Gospel teaching: abundance in the treasure, beauty or charity in the pearl, and universal reach in the net, whose shore-side sorting qualifies the present gathering. At verse 52 he turns Jesus' question about understanding toward teaching office: the instructed scribe draws new and old from sacred doctrine's treasury and, as Christ's notary, writes the commands first in his own heart and then in others. Aquinas's Catena aurea places Chrysostom's fearful net after treasure and pearl so that hearers do not rely on preaching or bare faith without a corresponding life. These are medieval syntheses, not proof of Matthew's compositional design, and Aquinas is not made the author of the Catena's patristic extracts. Christian Old/New Testament readings require correction whenever they become contempt for Israel; Matthew's own image calls both stores treasure.

The short form ends before all of this. A celebration choosing Matthew 13:44–46 does not proclaim net, angels, furnace, understanding, or the scribe. This guide may document those as an authorized alternative, but preaching claims must follow the branch actually proclaimed.

Called toward the Son amid groaning (Second Reading)

Romans 8:28 is often detached from its argumentative world. Immediately before, creation and believers groan and the Spirit aids weak prayer; immediately after, Paul names affliction, persecution, hunger, peril, and the love from which none can separate the baptized. The "all things" claim is therefore consolation within suffering, not denial of it.

Chrysostom's Homily 15 on Romans interprets God's action as turning even adversity toward the good of those who love him. He does not call the adversity good in itself. The chain of foreknowledge, predestination, call, justification, and glorification is centered on conformity to the Son, who is firstborn among many brothers and sisters. It supports confidence in divine initiative, not fatalism about individual events or a prosperity guarantee.

Aquinas first distinguishes the good of the whole from the good of the person who suffers, then reads Romans 8:28 as the Spirit's particular ordering for those who love God: affliction can exercise humility, patience, wisdom, and benevolence without becoming good in itself. At verses 29–30 he treats conformity to the Son as the end or effect of predestination, not a foreseen merit that causes it, and unfolds the chain from eternal preparation into calling and justification (Super Romanos VIII, lect. 6).

The Second Vatican Council places this conformity in a paschal horizon: Christ makes the human vocation clear, and the person patterned on the dying Christ advances toward resurrection in hope (Gaudium et spes, 22). The Catechism supplies an equally important boundary at nn. 311–312: creaturely freedom can produce moral evil, God is not its direct or indirect cause, and the good providence draws from evil never makes evil itself good. Together these sources define both the confidence and the refusal required by Romans 8.

Haydock's later compilation makes complementary moves. At verse 28, "purpose" is God's will rather than a human plan. At verse 29, conformity includes suffering with Christ, following his teaching, and imitating his life; the notes join special grace to free cooperation and warn against prying into secret election. At verse 30 they name faith, hope, love, and penance in justification and do not infer final perseverance from every justified state. Divine initiative therefore does not erase agency or authorize assigning a living person a certain final status.

The reading is semi-continuous. Its "purpose" should not be casually equated with Solomon's administrative vocation or the merchant's search. Liturgical juxtaposition can ask what sort of good governs discernment; it cannot claim Matthew's treasure decodes Paul's predestination.

A pastoral misuse refused

The reading does not tell a harmed person that abuse, catastrophe, or injustice was secretly good, nor that protest or protection resists Providence. Christian hope says God can work within what creatures do wickedly and conform sufferers to Christ without blessing evil. Immediate safety, lament, justice, medicine, and communal aid remain compatible with trust.

Revelation received by the humble (Acclamation)

The acclamation adapts rather than reproduces Jesus' thanksgiving in Matthew 11:25. Chrysostom's Homily 38 says the contrast does not condemn genuine learning; it exposes self-sufficient resistance and praises those who receive revelation without pretension. Aquinas likewise distinguishes the proud posture from teachable littleness. That humility fits Solomon's request but is not identical with royal discernment, and Matthew 11 is not relocated into the Matthew 13 scene.

Two Communion paths and one final petition (Communion A; Communion B; Prayer after Communion)

Communion A takes one verse from Psalm 102 under the Latin numbering: the soul commands itself to bless and not forget divine benefits. Augustine's exposition of Psalm 103 (English page numbering) makes the command self-address and unfolds memory through mercy, healing, rescue, compassion, and creaturely frailty. Bellarmine likewise treats the opening summons as deliberate gratitude. At Communion that canonical memory resists entitlement and amnesia, but neither commentary proves an original Eucharistic referent or selection of this alternative.

Communion B joins two adjacent beatitudes without making them one merit formula. Augustine distinguishes merciful action and its promised mercy from the purified heart and its promised vision; Chrysostom emphasizes generosity and an interior freedom from corrupt desire, while Aquinas later keeps the promised ends distinct. None comments on this later antiphon. At the Eucharist the pair places reception under a demanding horizon: the communicant asks to become merciful and undivided, not merely to possess a sacred object.

The alternatives remain distinct. Either can illuminate the final prayer's confession of the perpetual memorial of the Son's Passion and its petition that divine love advance salvation. Its fruit is gift calling for lived response, neither mechanical nor self-achieved.

The Propers: Notable and Quotable

- Matthew 13:45–46, both Gospel branches — Nathaniel Hawthorne, The Scarlet Letter (1850). Hester's language of a pearl "of great price" redirects the Gospel image toward the child understood as her costly and only treasure amid Puritan shame and exclusion. The chapter marks the purchase logic; the novel's moral world is not made an interpretation of Matthew.
- Matthew 13:45–46, both Gospel branches — The Pearl of Great Price. Franklin D. Richards's 1851 compilation and its later institutional reception turn the Gospel phrase into the title of a scriptural anthology. An official study manual explains the title dependence. This entry documents reception without adjudicating the collection's religious claims.
- Romans 8:28, independent Second Reading — Margaret Murray Robertson, Christie Redfern's Troubles (1866). A chapter titled "The Secret of Peace" places the verse inside a dispute over trust, passivity, suffering, and who may rightly claim the promise. Narrative argument, not an isolated citation, supplies the transformation; the novel remains reception evidence rather than doctrinal authority.

The Propers: Interpretive Possibilities

These exploratory proposals arose in an AI-assisted editorial process. They are attributed to none of the cited authorities and claim no historical compositional intent. Each states its anchors and limits.

A listening treasury. (Coll.; First Reading; Responsorial Psalm; long Gospel) Solomon's listening heart, the Psalm's word and understanding, and the long-form scribe's new and old treasures can be heard with the Collect's petition for guidance. Ambrose and Benedict XVI illuminate the listening heart, while Origen illuminates the scribe; their separate receptions do not make this complete chain inherited teaching. The conjunction encourages teachability and responsible handing-on rather than information hoarding. The scribe is long-form only, and no compositional intent is claimed.

Value conversion is not purchase of grace. (Coll.; Responsorial Psalm; Gosp.; Prayer over Offerings) The Psalm values instruction above gold, the parables picture decisive disposal, the Collect distinguishes passing from lasting goods, and the offering prayer returns gifts first received. Ambrose, Chrysostom, Francis, and Ferraro illuminate individual movements; joining all four texts is the proposal's editorial act. Together they invite examination of money, time, attention, and allegiance as gifts ordered toward the Kingdom. Grace is not merchandise, possession is not intrinsically evil, and duties to others remain.

The authorized branches teach different endings. (Gospel branches; First Reading) The short form closes with value, joy, and disposal; the long form adds net, judgment, understanding, and the scribe, which can be heard beside Solomon's discernment. Patristic commentaries follow the Gospel sequence, while this contrast arises from the modern Lectionary's alternative endings. Attending to the enacted ending helps preacher and reader respect what was actually proclaimed. The short form is authorized and complete, not deficient; long-only material may never be smuggled into its literal account.

Providence transforms persons without making harm morally good. (Second Reading; Prayer after Communion) Romans' purpose and conformity to the Son can be heard with the perpetual memorial of the Passion and the prayer that divine love advance salvation. Chrysostom and Aquinas address Providence amid adversity; the liturgical prayer supplies the Passion memorial. Their conjunction supports resilient hope, truthful lament, and action shaped toward Christ rather than denial of injury. The proposal never sanctifies abuse or displaces safeguarding, treatment, reporting, restitution, or justice.

House, siblings, and net form an ecclesial test. (Entrance; Second Reading; long Gospel; Communion B) A united dwelling, the firstborn among many siblings, a net of every kind, and mercy with purity form a proposed sequence of gathering, formation, and judgment. Existing reception illuminates these images separately; their sequence here remains editorial. Its fruit is hospitality joined to integrity and humble accountability. The net and Communion B are unresolved branch-dependent anchors; final separation belongs to God, and no person or social group may be branded disposable.

Memory loosens possession. (Communion A; Prayer over Offerings; Gosp.; Prayer after Communion) The summons not to forget benefits, the return of received bounty, the Gospel's selling, and the Passion memorial suggest a movement from gratitude through stewardship toward self-gift. The checked witnesses illuminate the separate motions without establishing this single liturgical chain. Its fruit is grateful use rather than anxious possession or forgetful consumption. Communion A remains unresolved, and the proposal condemns neither property, contracts, saving, nor provision for dependents.

- Missale Romanum, editio typica tertia (Vatican City, 2002), Week XVII, pp. 466–467; the shared owner records the checksum-matched witness and official 2008 variation-list result (Ordinary Time changes listed only at pp. 457 and 471). Direct 2008 images for pp. 466–467 remain unchecked.
- United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, 2026 Liturgical Calendar and Lectionary 109 occurrence page, checked 2026-07-20; boundaries, alternatives, color, date, and occurrence only, under the source site’s terms.
- Bishops’ official Antiphonary, printed p. 75, corroborating the Entrance and Communion citations and dual Psalm numbering; protected antiphon wording is not reproduced.
- Holy Scripture: 1 Kings 3; Psalms 67 (68), 102 (103), and 119; Matthew 5, 11, and 13; Romans 8. Historical orientation used the corresponding New American Bible, Revised Edition introductions, texts, and notes at First Kings, Psalms, Matthew, and Romans.
- General Instruction of the Roman Missal, nn. 46–90 and 352–367; General Introduction to the Lectionary, nn. 65–69, 78–91, and 93–110; structural and relationship controls, cited bibliographically without a new Holy See link.
- Catechism of the Catholic Church, nn. 121–123, 128–130, 311–312, and 541–546, official Holy See text; Second Vatican Council, Gaudium et spes, no. 22, and Nostra aetate, no. 4; doctrinal and corrective controls.

Reception and doctrinal illumination

- St. Ambrose, On the Duties of the Clergy II.8, 44–49, on Solomon’s prudent heart, hearing, and just judgment; and Expositio Psalmi CXVIII, VIII, 2–4 and IX, 21–22, Latin text in M. Petschenig, ed., CSEL 62 (1913), on the Lord as portion and the law above gold.
- St. Augustine, Exposition on Psalm 68, used with its anti-Jewish matter excluded; Exposition on Psalm 103; and Exposition on Psalm 119.
- St. Robert Bellarmine, Commentary on the Psalms, Psalms 67, 102, and 118 at the appointed loci; hostile inherited or editorial framing was excluded.
- St. John Chrysostom, Homily 15 on Matthew, Homily 38, and Homily 47; St. Augustine, Sermon on the Mount I and Sermon 24; Origen, Commentary on Matthew X.
- St. John Chrysostom, Homily 15 on Romans, direct treatment of Romans 8:28–30 within adversity and divine purpose.
- Benedict XVI, Angelus, 24 July 2011, on Solomon’s listening heart, conscience, truth, justice, and peace; Francis, Angelus, 27 July 2014, and Angelus, 26 July 2020, on discovery, search, grace, willingness, joy, and the Kingdom. These are exact-Sunday receptions, not compositional evidence.
- Giuseppe Ferraro, S.J., La colletta Protector in te sperantium, Deus: Commento Biblico, Notitiae 49 (2013), 472–478, a signed biblical study of the Week XVII Collect; used as scholarly illumination rather than a magisterial act.
- St. Thomas Aquinas, Super Romanos VIII, lect. 6, nn. 686–713; Super Matthaum V, lect. 2; XI, lect. 3; and XIII, lect. 4. Latin loci controlled the paraphrases. His Catena aurea on Matthew 13 was used as a medieval compilation, not made the original author of its patristic extracts.
- Peter Comestor, Historia scholastica, III Kings, “De somnio Salomonis”; medieval retelling, not an independent ancient-event witness.
- George Leo Haydock, later Catholic compilation on 1 Kings 3 and Romans 8; not treated as an ancient witness or substitute for direct sources.

Literary and institutional afterlives

- Nathaniel Hawthorne, The Scarlet Letter (Boston, 1850), ch. VI; child, cost, and social exclusion in a direct “great price” reuse. Public domain in the United States.
- Franklin D. Richards and later Latter-day Saint reception, official Pearl of Great Price study manual; title dependence and institutional history paraphrased without bulk quotation.
- Margaret Murray Robertson, Christie Redfern’s Troubles (1866), ch. XVII; Romans 8:28 within a narrative dispute over trust and suffering. Public domain in the United States.
